Developmental Asset #10 – Safety – October 1, 2014

Young person feels safe at home, in school, and in the neighborhood.

Safety, both physically and emotionally, has to be the most important asset a child has at home. If not provided at home, it must be present somewhere, and with someone, for a child to thrive. Safety at school is essential for learning. Ideally, it will be present everywhere in the community.

- Everyone needs to notice children without many friends, and those not participating, avoiding school, or with unusual traits (in the most general meaning of the word) that might make them outcasts or targets of others.
- Parents and all school adults (teachers, bus drivers, board members, others) need a focus on a healthy school climate and be aware of and respond to all types of bullying and violence at school.
- All organizations (government, social service agencies, businesses, teams, etc.) need to practice positive communication in the workplace (where bullying is not rare), to influence what happens outside of the workplace (as well as to improve the inside).
- Parents need to be aware of what their children send and receive on the internet and what tools are available to help them.
- Personally, each of us can take responsibility for safety in our neighborhood, and be the someone providing safety for a child who doesn't feel it at home.
